Cambridge Archive Editions in Brief

Overview

What does the Cambridge Archive Editions contain?

Cambridge Archive Editions (CAE) are historical reference materials representing many thousands of original documents of the National Archives (UK) represented in facsimile, including numerous maps, on the national heritage and political development of many countries. This body of documents is arranged in the following primary source research collections: Near and Middle East; Slavic, Balkan and Caucasus; East and Southeast Asia; North America.

Collections

East and Southeast Asia

This area covers Japan, China, Hong Kong, Korea, Taiwan and, under the title “Straits Settlements”: Penang, Singapore, Malacca and Labuan. This is one of our two newer branches of research and there are eight titles providing a sound basis for serious research of East and Southeast Asia.

Slavic, Balkan and Caucasus

This area is one of our two newer branches of research and is intended to give a good grounding in the Balkan region, with six titles, particularly concerning boundary issues. Five titles on Armenia, the Caucasus and Russia address further this important area.

Near and Middle East

This area was the original one for research and publication from 1986 onwards. Britain has a rich history with Middle Eastern countries via its East India Company trade routes up through the Persian Gulf and the British archives have particularly deep veins of material on boundary formation, tribal relations, state development and political relations.

North America

America & Great Britain: Diplomatic Relations, 1775-1815: British Documents provides 7,000 pages of primary material, charting the emergence of an independent America. The set is made up of the diplomatic, official correspondence between America and Britain and gives an extraordinary insight into the shaping of a nation, from America being referred to as “our Colonies and Plantations in North America” by King George III to its recognition as the “United States” by Britain in 1782.

Building country collections

Cambridge Archive Editions titles, with some exceptions, fall into three types:

- Series of political reports
- Collections of key documents
- Reproductions, in facsimile, of some classic standard works of reference

CAEO User Guide: April 2021

We usually prefer to survey a country or region we are approaching for the first time by establishing a comprehensive series of political and often economic reports. This exercise provides a basic historical study of an area and is sold based on a complete sequence of material which was never previously located or unified. See our report sequences on Japan, China, Soviet Union, Arab World etc.

The next step is to go on to a regional records type-project, where the documents chosen will be dispatches, telegrams, memoranda, and surveys, rather than series of periodic reports. More specific areas can be followed down later: we can, for example, look at aspects of specific interest, which may have a regional basis, eg Arab Dissident Movements - selective studies, eg of a regime, of dissidence, of the ruling family, of international bodies etc.

Classic works of reference, like Lorimer's Gazetteer of the Persian Gulf, are unbeatable for an historic overview. Thus, we achieve an orderly structure for an area.

The collections of key documents are always made on specific and well-defined areas of research and each collection has the added value of arrangement into specific topics and document by document identification/description. The series of political reports focus on completeness and organization of material previously unknown or scattered. Each collection is researched and edited by a professional researcher and sometimes also in cooperation with an academic specialist and presented in facsimile.

Understanding Political Reports Series

Political reports provide scholars, researchers and historians with a tremendously detailed archive of material on each of the areas covered.

Over the years many different series of reports have been undertaken by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in response to the events on the ground. These series wax and wane with the tide of history but they are also subject to the force of personality of the compiler and the voracious demands of the British Foreign Office for information. Certain government officials will be seen to be prolific and others merely content to cover the main points clearly. However, whether the reports are being demanded by Her Majesty's Government or showered upon it by officials in residence the effect is to leave a national treasure for following generations in the form of regular, structured, detailed reports of the current events, main players and political direction of the day. At one end of the scale alongside the public security and political events, the weekly reports log the minutiae of administration, with details of sowing and harvesting as well as trade, health and education. At the other end of the scale is the annual report sweeping grandly through the events of a year, giving a thorough background in the main political movements and permitting itself only the small luxury of a short chronology to furnish a little detail.

Understanding the Inclusion of "Poor Quality" Images

From time to time we receive feedback regarding the Cambridge Archive Editions list, not about the content of the books, but about the poor quality of some of the documents included.

CAEO User Guide: April 2021

In fact, we have to agree, a small proportion of the pages noted are hard to read! However, please let me explain why we cannot supply you with these pages in a better condition.

In our sets of books, we are trying to create a collection of all the available British political reports, or all the memoranda or telegrams concerning a particular subject.

We choose to include all the documents that there are, in spite of the fact that some of them are in a bad condition, or parts of them are. This is because you may be able to read part of a document even in bad condition and therefore get an idea of what is going on in the document.

The condition of the documents is due to a combination of factors:

- Reports may have deteriorated due to the aging effects of acid in the paper – this is particularly noticeable with handwritten documents [all of our documents are at least 30 years old, and many are over 100 years old]
- Sometimes the originals are already only carbon copies which are a poor reproduction to begin with and deteriorate further when printed
- Sometimes the paper on the originals is colored and makes for poor contrast with the ink when reproduced in black and white print
- Sometimes the documents have been previously microfilmed by the national archives because of the fragility of the original and the resulting microfilm is almost always dark

Please note that the printing process is not at fault here. You may rest assured that the quality of the print is good and if a measure is needed then the running head on each page, which is a modern addition by us, should always appear strong even if the document is weak.

The alternatives are either simply to leave the badly marked pages out of the collection altogether, or to re-type them. We maintain that it is better that they are in for the sake of continuity and for the parts of certain pages which can be read. We do not habitually re-type our material because if we have to guess at what the report says, we may change the meaning, if only by accident. We feel that by including all available material in facsimile, we keep a truer historical record.

Choice and Reproduction of Maps

Cambridge Archive Editions often includes large folding maps as part of document collections. These maps may have originally been attached to the documents, but more usually we search out and add contemporary maps to help illustrate topics covered in the documents such as the growth of a border, movement of tribes or the location of pearl fisheries. Often the original maps we are working from are more than 1 metre by 1 metre and sometimes we only use a section to illustrate what we need. Occasionally if we are only trying to convey a general point about a large territory, we may significantly reduce a map and consequently some of the smaller place-names may be impossible to read. Generally, however, we try not to reduce any maps to less than 80% of their original size.

- ISBN: Performs a search on all ISBN volume numbers only (not ISBN for Sets). This includes print and electronic numbers designated by p-ISBN and e-ISBN respectively. Numbers may be entered with or without dashes for any volume search.
- Product #: The product number code is an East View number assigned and typically used for reference with customer service and operations functions.

Virtual Keyboard

The virtual keyboard is provided as on-screen option for bi- or multi-lingual users who are using keyboards in languages other than English. This feature is also beneficial as an alternative input method for disabled users and users without keyboard access. Selecting the keyboard icon expands the virtual keyboard to the users screen.

Logic Searches and Tips

Stem search

This feature allows the user to conduct a search on not only a word, but also all of the grammatically correct derivations of the search word. It is similar to using the asterisk wildcard at the end of a word, but the stem search automatically determines the root of the word for you and goes from there.

Example: A search on the word “annuals” will also deliver results with the word “annual”.

Exact phrase search

" " - When you enclose a word, title, or phrase in quotes to conduct a search, the query will return a list of documents with the exact words that you specified, in the same exact order that you specified. This search will return the fewest number of search results.

Example: “annual reports”

Wildcards

* – Use the asterisk [*] as a wildcard to find the same word with different endings.

Example: tele*, returns articles containing the words telegram, telegraph, telephone, telephoned

? – Use the question mark [?] as a wildcard to find variations for only one character.

Example: st?mp, finds "stamp", "stomp"

Logic operators

and – This operator will look for matches to ALL words in the same document or field.

Example: annual and reports (returns articles with BOTH words) or, [space] – A search conducted with 'or' operator between words will look for matches to ANY word or words specified in the search field.

Example: annual report (returns articles with either or both words)

Proximity operator

~n – this operator limits the distance between the words in queries and phrases.

Example: "ethnic states"~10 (means that the word “ethnic” must be within the limits of 10 words from the word “states”)

E-book Menu Navigation and Descriptions

This section covers the tools and options available to the user once they have navigated to the volume level of the collection. Many of these tools are intuitive and similar to those found in most portable document format readers.

Metadata

The Meta-info button displays the volume details regarding the author/editor, city, country, publishing, pages, language, ISBN's, product number, subjects and persistent URL.

Cite

Download citations for the selected articles in RIS format.

Download/Print Pages

The Download and Print allow a user to download or print selected document pages in increments of 1 to 50 with 50 as the maximum. Specifically, selecting a range of document pages (not page numbers) can be performed multiple times without limitation. Emailed documents will appear as PDF files.

The Gear icon drops down to give the user options to view the page in different settings.

The Hand Icon gives users the option to move (or pan) the page.

The Arrow icon gives users the option to select text.

Plus, Minus, and Magnifier give the user the option to increase the size of the page.
